Similar to buffing, polishing also changes the surface of metal material. The difference may be that the polishing process is often a preparation for the buffing process. Polishing may involve removing oxidation and improving the quality of the metal material by adding protection or removing fading, water spots, sun spots or cloudiness. That is not to say that some of these functions could not be achieved by buffing. Again, the two phrases can easily be used interchangeably. However, they do possess a few distinct characteristics.
