

Saw Machines

Saw machines are an integral part of any woodworking workshop. With different types being used for different purposes, technology has come far from a time when only manually operated saws were available. These days, there are specialised automatic saw machines that serve various purposes. For instance, a reciprocating saw is used for cutting out custom shapes. However, they are not so useful when it comes to cutting out straight lines. Circular saws, on the other hand, are ideal for cutting in straight lines, and offer enough power to cut through concrete surfaces. While the above mentioned options offer a lot of mobility, the table saw, which is much less mobile, offers a lot of versatility. From ripping to crosscutting, and mitering to beveling, table saw machines are an essential for every workshop. Similarly, another extremely portable saw is the miter saw. As the name suggests, the saw is fitted miter box fitted with guides to precise 45 and 90 degree cuts. Lastly, there is the band saw, which is one of the most versatile tools as it offers a lot of power to cut through both wood and metal.
